Kind Acts Foundation Offers Teachers A Way To Honor Kids For Kindness

Teachers can recognize students for acts of kindness in many ways. Now, thanks to a Kind Acts program offered nationally to teachers, there is another.

The Kind Acts Foundation, www.KindActs.org, offers PK-12 teachers an easy way to formally honor kids for kind deeds. The foundation sends a personalized certificate detailing the child's kind act along with a Kind Acts lapel pin to any teacher making a request at their site. The teacher decides how to present the certificate and pin to the student.

The Kind Acts Foundation is privately funded, so there is no cost.

Since receiving national exposure on the Paul Harvey syndicated radio show, the Kind Acts Foundation is sending awards to an ever-increasing number of students around the country.

"I was a high school teacher for 25 years," says Kind Acts founder Dave Hall. "This is an idea I've had for some time – using the incredible reach of the internet to offer teachers a simple and free way to honor their students."

Education organizations are helping to spread the word in several states about the Kind Acts Foundation's service.

"We're getting support at every turn," adds Hall, "probably because we have no agenda other than trying to provide a valuable and free service for teachers and kids."
